

positive displacement pump

Pump in which liquid is induced to flow from the supply source through inlet piping and inlet valve; water is brought into the pump volute by a vacuum created by the withdrawal of a piston or piston like device, which, on its return, displaces a certain volume of water contained in the volute and forces it to flow through the discharge valve and piping.